in a greater degree than any other with which we can operate the mind thus it is necessary that we should in order to acquire a thorough and complete education and if we study study we are certain that we will get knowledge of them, and hence it necessarily follows that a knowledge of the necessary for a thorough education. Thus have I described to you an education, when any one thus thoroughly educated, having the training and other things I have mentioned in an eminent degree, transfers himself from his college and takes his station in the world with suitable natural talents, he will soon make his fortune trouble with his eloquence or become the delight or head of refined society. In the hearts of his country's standard of literature or excell in any pursuit to which he may direct his attention and above all he will be truly religious and good man, unshaken of his