experience and history. I beg you not to let your patience be weary, if I am forced to allude to a few facts only that are trite and somewhat threadbare. Although they are common and seemingly uninteresting, yet I love to have you tile in support of the principles I hold, that are hoary with age, and about the correctness of which there is no debate. I come not to theorize and speculate about the matter, for this is not our province, ours is to deal with men of action, not speculative and theoretical. We do not strain your judgment, nor appeal to your credulity to accede to the justice of our claims, and the correctness of our conclusions. We refer you to the actual facts and concerns of life. It is not a mere fancy or image of a heated imagination with which we have to deal, but the stern realities of life. We do not call on you to believe the effects of which are possible, not probable that may have resulted from the expressions of opinions.
