The heart of the Christian. They have justified the ways of true and men, and directed movements in the only path of happiness. Such men as these are the pride and glory of our race; to them are the eyes of their countrymen turned in the hour of adversity. Before these how must the sceptical monarch and the leader of victorious arms vanish into air. But they are immortal. Then the mighty men of old are covered with the veil of oblivion and there are none to hymn their praises. Their will the names of their teachers and benefactors be freshly engraven on the hearts of the people for whom they laboured.

Such, Mr. President, there have been some of the comparative respectively attained by men of thought and men of action, and such in my opinion their respective characters.
