The President's house is well finished.

I went to the city of Raleigh two or three days ago, and had an opportunity of seeing the legislature. In number it appeared respectable. There were about 130 members in the house of commons, more than 60 in the senate. Evan Colyander was one of the members. General Dawne stands foremost and an almost unlimited leader in every capital enterprise of the state. After having spent some time in conversation at the greater part of his evening, and from every information, he appears to be a man of good abilities, and ever active in every measure for promoting the honor and interest of the state. In the legislature he seems like a parent struggling for the welfare and happiness of his children. No doubt however he frequently finds them refractory. The state appears to be improving with energies. It is almost the only province in which parents educate their children. Religion is so little in vogue, and such a state of depression that it offers no prospect sufficient to tempt them to undertake its causes. In New Jersey it has the public respect and support. But in N. Carolina and particularly in that part of the state which lies east of us, every one believes that the first step which should be made...
