of their own state too, that they support it with a patience which deserves credit, proportioned to the inconvenience of their circumstances. When the weather permits them to be in the open air, they fly to the shade, where they may find a retreat from the heat, the sun, and the intolerable conversation of so crowded a society. But when the weather is unfavorable, there is no relief, and they must of necessity bear the evil, submitting as it is to their sense of duty and emulation. So unprofitably has the want of some cool seat, that formerly they were even at some expense and personal labor, to erect in the woods, huts which might protect them from the season, while they might rest without interruption. These were found liable to break, and to be in the hands of care, prohibiting the building or retaining of these huts, in full confirmation to the public, if any be needed, of the truth of these statements.

But let us pursue this subject still further. The state had the design to erect, for its use, a building in the hands of care, prohibiting the building or retaining of these huts, in full confirmation of the public, if any be needed, of the truth of these statements. This building was planned, not by the "demigods" alone, as the Citizen declared, but by Governor Straight, as the draft of it by his own hand, kept at the university, is always ready to show. This building will contain...
