be the first to condemn? Cut off as she is from all sympathy, her motives called in question, guided to desperation by the dishonorable conduct of her adversaries. Comment is useless. Yet it is apparent that so long as the usurpations of government are persisted in we must be in imminent danger of a dissolution, and all the horrors of anarchy which would follow in its train. If these acts of injustice can in any manner be checked and peace, a harmony once again restored we may then look forward to the future with some degree of confidence that the progress of succeeding ages will only be checked with that of our country in wealth and prosperity. Let us may consider the danger to be apprehended from the violence of political parties. The American who has turned the page of history which records the power, magnificence, vast extent of territory, parties, divisions, contentions and finally the destruction of ancient, and modern republics, and compared with these the virulence and animosity of parties in his own land, enter into the abodes of private families, procuring in their every
