Being in every city and which are banishing men for their political opinions, however essential the measures to the public prosperity, however sacred the principles involved. They are to be decided not by their utility to the public welfare, but by party principles not by the benefit they will confer on the whole Union but by geographical lines and sectional divisions. A people who incurred the dangers and experienced the inconveniences of a civil war before they would pay a small tax of a few pence to their Mother, will not be deprived of their rights by an ungrateful brother. Our unyielding devotion to liberty and our deep attachment to our Country have long since yielded to party strife and sectional divisions.
